DOROTHY GILLIAM

Dorothy Butler Gilliam writes a twice-weekly column for The Washington Post. Gilliam came to The Post in 1961 and worked as a reporter on the metropolitan desk for three years. She then worked as a reporter for the television program, Panorama, on WTTG-TV in Washington, D.C. She returned to The Post in 1972 as an assistant editor of the Style section and was made a columnist in 1979.

She is the author of Paul Robeson, All American, published in 1976 by New Republic Books.

Among the honors she has received are the Ann O'Hare McCormick Award from the New York Newspaper Woman's Club, Journalist of the Year, Achievement in Journalism, and Washington Media Awards from the Capital Press Club, the Unity Award in Journalism from Lincoln University, Jefferson City, Missouri, and the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism Alumni of the Year Award.

A former Woodrow Wilson Fellow and ex-board member of the Fund for Investigative Journalism, Gilliam has served as chair of the Institute for Journalism Education.

Born in Memphis, Tennessee, Gilliam earned her bachelor's degree from Lincoln University, Jefferson City, Missouri, and her master's degree at the Columbia University School of Journalism.

Gilliam resides in Washington, D.C. and is the mother of three daughters.
